

A Brilliant Exhibition
At the Metropolitan

cidedly requires more detailed attention than it is possible to give it in the present general survey of the exhibition. The truth is that the League has not in years brought together such a full assemblage of good things.

The architecture, as we have indicated, gives a healthy and really inspiring account of the current state of affairs, and all the other arts and crafts are in wholesome form. There are more than 1,500 numbers in the catalogue and the proportion of those which point to quite superfluous objects is refreshingly small. There are some major matters on which we would like to pause, such as the representation of the art of the late George W. Breck, a fine decorator, lofty in ideas and the master of a style full of dignity. There are any number of other arresting items, like Mr. Culver's great full-rigged ship, Mr. Benda's grotesquely enchanting masks, the exhibits of certain workers in silver and in silk, the tapestries from the Edgewater looms, the drawings of early American architecture by Mr. Otto Eggers, the glass by Heinicke and Smith and others, the stage settings by H. Rosse, the paintings of tropical fruits by Grace H. Turnbull. Not in years has the League so justified its later diversified policy. Fortunately for the connoisseur of the most advanced of all the arts in the United States, it gives, this season, plenty of room to architecture. Having done this, and having had heaps of space left, it has been generously yet judiciously hospitable to the sister arts. The result is a noble exhibition, one which no lover of art can afford to neglect, and one which we cannot help feeling is likely to have a profoundly stimulating effect.

The Roman Academy
Work Recently Executed Under Its Aegis

In one of the most commodious of the apartments at the disposal of the League there have been placed the latest envois from students of the American Academy at Rome. They make a little exhibition by themselves and have a deep interest for believers in the function of this institution. It is the mission of the Academy to stimulate the imagination of picked men, to take young painters, sculptors and architects who have proved their technical mettle and give an inspiring direction to their ideas. The annual manifestations of the good work that is thus being done vary inevitably, according to the individual timber in hand. Only once in so often may we expect an artist of the gifts of Paul Manship, for example. The offerings this year are a little mixed.

Mr. Russell Cowles is a painter of great promise. He has obviously subjected himself to the influence of Veronese and his "Allegorical Painting for Ceiling Decoration," done in the tradition of that master, is astounding in the technical authority it reveals. Furthermore, Mr. Cowles has several other canvases which show that he can detach himself from Veronese and paint "off his own bat." With his addressness, his uncanny plumb and his skill both in form and in color, he raises the liveliest hopes of a serious accession to the ranks of our mural painters. Mr. Allyn Cox rivals him in dexterity and polish, but in taste he swerves surprisingly from the standards associated with the Academy. He emulates the Caracci, of all the many types to be observed in Italy, and receives their redundant flourishes with a lamentable devotion. The marvel of his mural decorations is not that they should have been done so well, but that, to use the old saying, they should have been done at all.

The same matter of taste is raised by the collaborators in the design for a villa to house the American Ambassador. It may have been great fun for Messrs. Shutze, Lawson and Jones to have played with this bit of bravura on paper, but it ought to have occurred to them that a building actually constructed on the lines followed by them would only repeat the hollow effect of one of the later and least edifying periods in the architecture of Italy. Mr. Lawson is on far more satisfying ground in his drawings of the Villa Gamberaia. There are some excellent drawings by J. K. Smith and R. M. Kennedy. Mr. Kennedy's restoration of the baths of the women at Hadrian's villa is particularly fine. Both the sculptors, C. P. Jennewein and Joseph Renier, have unmistakable talent, from which sterling work may be expected. The former also shows himself to be a good draftsman, in general profile portraits. Mr. R. E. Griswold, winner of the 1920 competition in landscape architecture, gives an auspicious account of himself; and there are interesting if not precisely thrilling elements in the work successful in the same year by Carlo Ciampaglia, Gaetano Cecere and J. K. Smith. The exhibition as a whole maintains the prestige of the Academy. But the fundamental principles which McKim had in mind need to be defended against the excursions and forays of students into the more baroque periods.

Lois Weber Will Buy Stories

The following announcement from Lois Weber studios is of interest to scenario writers:

"Lois Weber writes practically all of her own stories and continuities and is now proceeding with the production of her next two special productions; but unusual stories, especially those built around worth while themes, will be purchased at liberal figures.

"Send all manuscripts to Lois Weber Productions, Santa Monica Boulevard and Vermont Avenue, Hollywood, Calif."

Miss Weber wishes stories with a theme. Stories must be of such a type that if it were necessary they could be shown in any church in the country.

The Points of Emphasis developed by present conditions and their relation to this Store and to you are well illustrated by the splendid news today.

The first point is ECONOMY—the fact that today prices are very low; lower than they have been in several years; lower in some cases than they were even before the war.

The second point relates to the reliability and stability of this Store—the fact that we are not led away after will-o'-the-wisps in a struggle to sell goods cheap. We do not care to sell anything at any time of which we should be ashamed to have our customer say a month or a year afterward: "I bought that at Loeser's."

And so we are careful to have all the merchandise in this Store thoroughly worthy—and likewise careful to tell the plain truth about it in the newspapers or across the counters.

Spring is here. And your spring needs in clothes and new home furnishings can be superbly filled at Loeser's.
